To Be Or Not To Be A Dane In Australia Mr Paul Skye

On his arrival in Australia in 1939, Sigurd Sjoquist did what every respectable Danish gentleman did when it came to employment. He placed an advertisement in the newspaper which announced his arrival, listed his many qualifications, attributes and interests, and his current availability. Sig waited for the offers to roll in, but there were none. When none were forthcoming, the only job he could find was lugging carcasses in a slaughterhouse and shovelling tonnes of coal, wondering all the while what had ever possessed him to come to this strange land. Sig was joined by his beloved Kirsten and shortly after their marriage, he volunteered for the Australian Army. He was dispatched to the Northern Territory with an advance party to halt the seemingly unstoppable advance of the Imperial Japanese Army. It was here that he learned survival skills from Xavier Herbert, the author of the novel Capricornia, and began to understand the character of these no nonsense Australians who had scant regard for the finer distinctions of class that still prevailed in Europe. He returned from the war a mental and physical wreck. Kirsten thought he could regain his former vitality by taking art classes. Yet, it was Kirsten who found she had a natural talent as a painter exhibiting successfully in Sydney and New York. From such terrible beginnings, Sig went on to create the Mercator business empire, raise a family, and through his involvement with Rotary and other community groups, forge everlasting bonds between the people of his old home and his new found land.
